If you think a gas leak is in your home, right here is what you ought to do:

Proceed with care. If you smell the gas leaking, it may be coming from your oven or hot water heater. Be careful when investigating the origins of the smell. If it is your stove, guarantee all burners are off; do not check the pilot light or spark any other type of fire. If you know how to safely shut off your hot water heater, do so, yet do not do anything that puts you in immediate danger.

Leave the house. Calmly get every person and animal out of the house. Hurrying about could knock something over or pull an electric wire in an electrical outlet, triggering a spark. Every person should stand faraway from the house, such as nearby or in a next-door neighbor's yard.

Get in touch with the utility company. The gas company needs to be informed at once whenever there is a significant gas leak. Only they can completely turn off all sources of gas in your residential property. Once they do so, you will need to wait a while, perhaps hours, prior to being able to reentering your residence. If safe, you can attempt to open up some home windows from the outdoors to air out the gas faster.

Call us. After the gas company has shut off your gas, connect with us to perform the needed repairs.
