If you presume a gas leak is in your house, below is what you need to do:

Proceed with care. If you smell the gas leaking, it could be coming from your oven or water heater. Beware when exploring the source of the odor. If it is your stove, ensure all burners are off; do not examine the pilot light or fire up any other type of fire. If you recognize how to safely shut off your hot water heater, do so, yet do refrain from doing anything that places you in immediate threat.

Depart from the house. Calmly get every family member and pet out of the house. Rushing around might knock something over or pull an electrical cord in an outlet, causing a spark. Every person must stand faraway from the house, such as across the street or in a neighbor's yard.

Call the utility service provider. The gas company should be notified at once whenever there is a significant gas leak. Only they can totally shut off all sources of gas in your residential property. Once they do so, you will need to wait a while, probably hours, before you can reenter your home. If safe, you can attempt to open up some windows from the outdoors to air out the gas quicker.

Call us. After the gas company has actually turned off your gas, connect with us to take care of the required repairs.

Installing New Gas Lines

Our technicians can likewise set up completely new gas lines in your house. We would be happy to consult with you about how to run gas lines for it.

Bear in mind, gas lines are not appropriate DIY tasks. Not just can the gas be dangerous, yet certain building and safety codes must be met. Just licensed professionals who recognize the local codes and laws for gas lines can set up or repair them.
