If you presume a gas leak is located in your home, below is what you need to do:

Proceed with care. If you smell the gas leaking, it could be originating from your oven or hot water heater. Beware when exploring the source of the smell. If it is your stove, make sure all ranges are off; do not examine the pilot light or spark any other type of flame. If you recognize just how to safely turn off your hot water heater, do so, but do refrain from doing anything that puts you in instant threat.

Leave the home. Calmly get every family member and pet out of the residence. Hurrying around might knock something over or pull an electric wire in an electrical outlet, causing a spark. Every person ought to stand well away from the house, such as nearby or in a next-door neighbor's yard.

Get in touch with the utility service provider. The gas company needs to be alerted at once whenever there is a significant gas leak. Only they can fully turn off all sources of gas in your residential property. Once they do so, you will be required to wait a while, perhaps hours, before you can reenter your residence. If safe, you can attempt to open up some windows from the outdoors to air out the gas much faster.

Call us. After the gas company has turned off your gas, get in touch with us to complete the required repairs.

Installing New Gas Lines

Our professionals can also install completely new gas lines in your home. We would certainly more than happy to consult with you regarding exactly how to run gas lines for it.

Bear in mind, gas lines are not appropriate Do It Yourself tasks. Not only can the gas be dangerous, yet certain building and safety codes should be met. Just licensed experts who are familiar with the local codes and regulations for gas lines can install or fix them.
